Korobochka (コロボ) @cirnosad

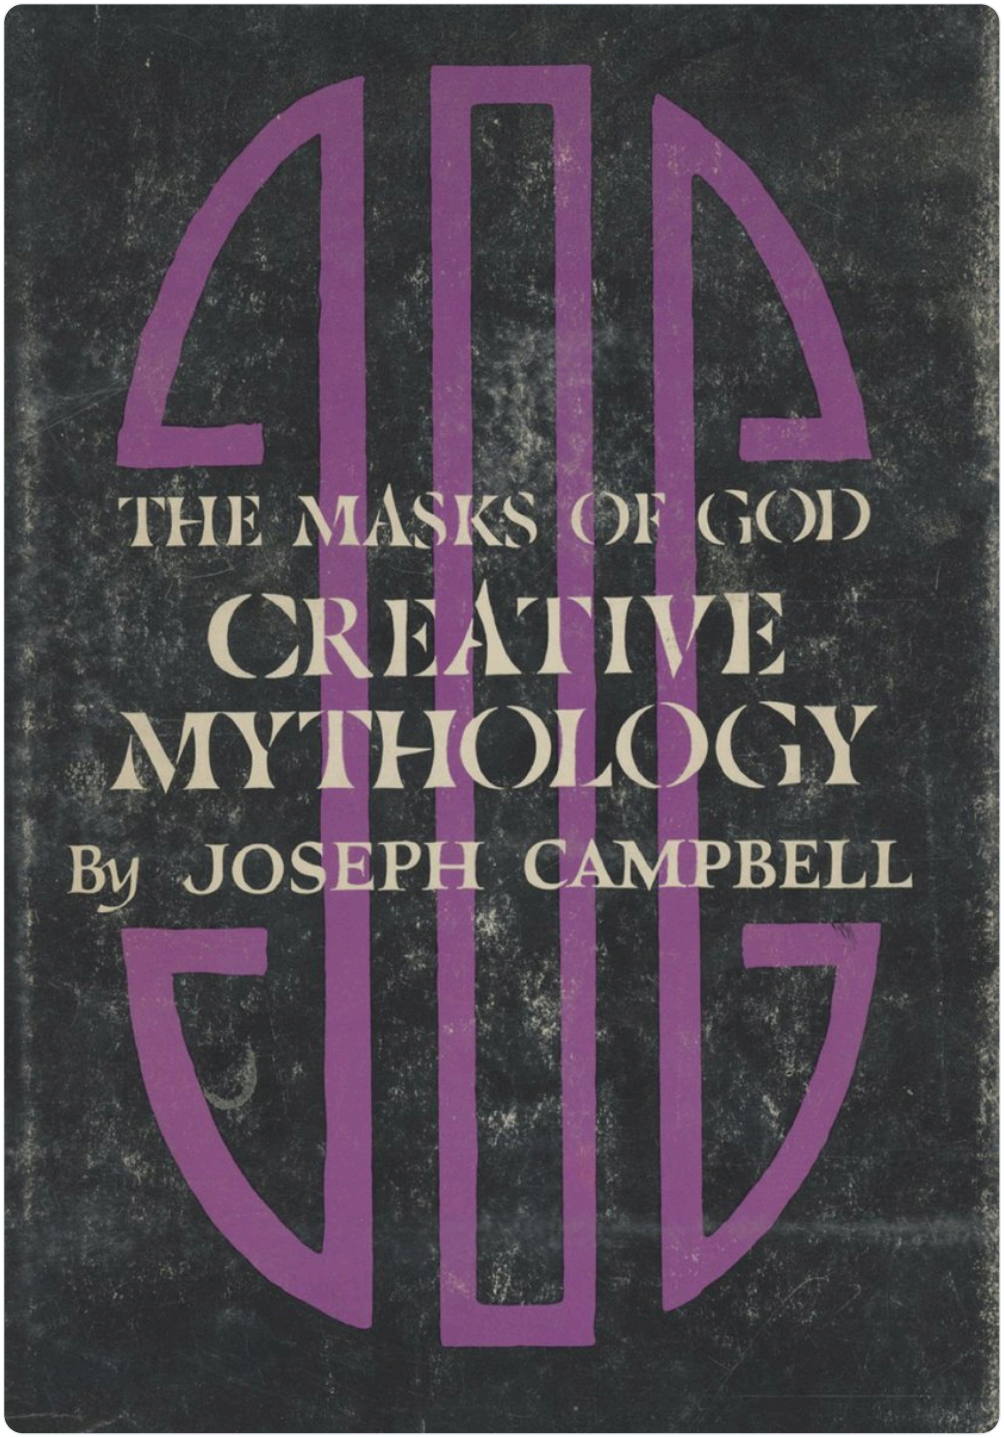
Jun 10, 2025 · 10 tweets · cirnosad/status/1932454959506952694

The golden Thaler by Magedeburger is one of the most elusive coins for gold coin collectors. Why?

The "Thaler" is the origin of the word, "dollar". It is the origin of the dollar sign ($), and has "NU 21" inscribed on it.

This is the most powerful and evil symbol in the word.

How many dollars would it take for you to betray everything you've ever stood for?



Try and find an archive copy of this book.
You will notice something shocking.

The pages 152 and 153 have been torn out.

inscription to Apollo, however, it might have been taken for the vessel of some Gnostic Christian sect, and its scene accordingly interpreted as of the sanctuary of the Love Feast; for both nakedness and serpent-worship were associated in many of the early Christian cults with a restoration of Paradise, and release thereby from the bondages of time.

In the words of the Gnostic "Gospel According to Thomas": "Mary said to Jesus: 'Whom are thy disciples like?' He said: 'They are like little children who have installed themselves in a field that is not theirs. When the owners of the field come, they will say: "Release to us our field." They take off their clothes before them to release it to them and to give back their field to them.' " [128] And again: "His disciples said: 'When wilt Thou be revealed to us and when shall we see Thee?' Jesus said: 'When you take off your clothing without being ashamed, and take your clothes and put them under your feet as the little children and tread on them, then shall you behold the Son of the Living One and you shall not fear.' " [129]

Saint Epiphanius (c. 315–402)—who for thirty-five years was the bishop of Constantia, on Cyprus, where Aphrodite and her serpent spouse had been for millenniums the chief divinities, and whose lifetime spanned that critical century from the reign of Constantine (324–337) to Theodosius I, "the Great" (379–395), when the Roman Empire was being converted from pagan to Christian worship [130]—described in a denunciatory tract the eucharistic service of one of the Christian Ophitic (ὄφις, "serpent") sects of his time:

> They have a snake, which they keep in a certain chest—the cista mystica—and which at the hour of their mysteries they bring forth from its cave. They heap loaves upon the table and summon the serpent. Since the cave is open it comes out. It is a cunning beast, and knowing their foolish ways, it crawls up on the table and rolls in the loaves; this, they say, is the perfect sacrifice. Wherefore, as I have been told, they not only break the bread in which the snake has rolled and administer it to those present, but each one kisses the snake on the mouth, for the snake has been tamed by a spell, or has been made gentle for their fraud by some other diabolical method. And they fall down before it and call this the Eucharist, consummated by the beast images of his Canaanite goddess-spouse, Asherah. King Hezekiah, c. 725 B.C., as we are told in the Book of Kings, "cut down the Asherah: and he broke in pieces the bronze serpent that Moses had made, for until those days the people of Israel had burned incense to it; it was called Nehushtan." [136] The approved Christian allegory is simply that, as the serpent of bronze lifted up by Moses on a staff counteracted the poison of a plague of serpents, so the lifting up of Jesus on the cross countervailed the poison of the serpent of the Garden. Both events are accepted as historical, and the earlier is read as a prefigurement of the later. We are not to think of Christ crucified as in any way another form of the serpent. The two sides of Hieronymus's golden thaler, in other words, are not to be reckoned as of equal value; nor is the higher value on the serpent's side. Or, at least, that is what a proper Christian would like to think the goldsmith intended us to understand.

Could it be, however, that he actually intended the reverse, namely, that Christ is a reference to the serpent, or even that the two are alternative manifestations of a power transcending both?

Throughout the material in the Primitive, Oriental, and Occidental volumes of this work, myths and rites of the serpent frequently appear, and in a remarkably consistent symbolic sense.

See for example:

This chapter in particular is about gnosticism and Professor Joseph Campbell demonstrates the origin of the dollar and dollar sign. An incredible feat given that "academics" insists it's simultaneously a mystery and NOT a snake on a stickhttps://dn720006.ca.archive.org/0/items/TheMasksOfGodVol.04CreativeMythologyCa mpbell_201703/The%20Masks%20of%20God%20-%20Vol.%2004%20-%20Creative%20Mythology%20-%20Campbell.pdf

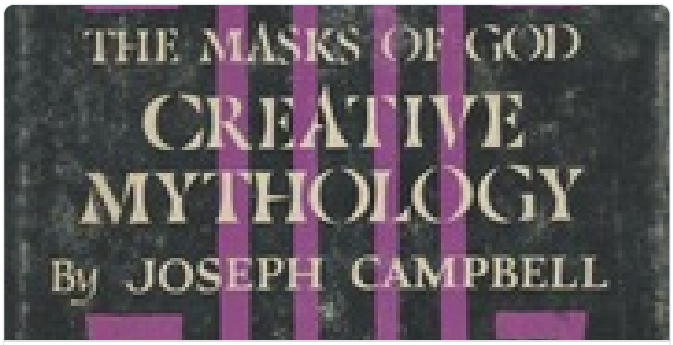
Try and find pages 152, 153:



The Masks Of God Vol. 04 Creative Mythology Campbell : Free Download, B... test
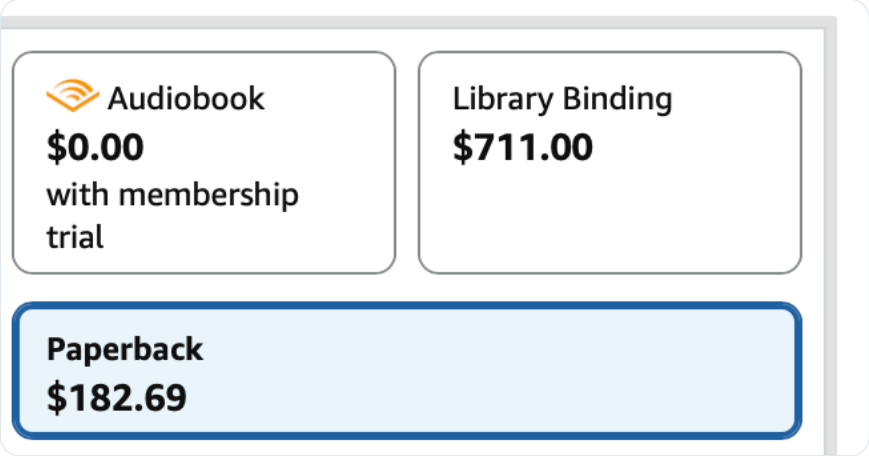
https://archive.org/details/TheMasksOfGodVol.04CreativeMythologyCampbell_201703...

Who is brave enough to buy this copy and find out if the pages 152 and 153 have been scrubbed by the printers? :)



Claude insists that the original coin with a clear NU 21 inscription is on page 153 of Joseph Campbell's work.

Where is it?
What was on these two pages?
Why were those two pages SPECIFICALLY removed from all archives and scanned copies online?

The Golden Thaler of Hieronymus Magedeburger: A rare biblical serpent coin from Reformation Germany

The specific coin you're searching for exists and has been documented in Joseph Campbell's scholarly work Creative Mythology (1968), where it appears as "Figure 27. The Serpent Lifted Up. Hieronymus Magedeburger, Golden Thaler, Germany late 16th century" on page 153. Blogger CG FEWSTON

The artist and his biblical medallions

Hieronymus Magedeburger (active 1507-1540) was a pioneering German die-cutter and goldsmith from the Freiberg family who worked in Annaberg between 1507-1533. CoinsWeekly He became known as the "father" of minted medals from the Ore Mountains region CoinsWeekly and specialized in creating biblical-themed coins that combined Protestant Reformation theology with traditional Christian typology. CoinsWeekly

The specific Golden Thaler you're seeking features a crucifix on one side and a serpent on a cross on the other with the inscription "NU 21" (referring to Numbers 21:8-9). Seiyaku This biblical reference tells the story of Moses lifting up the bronze serpent in the wilderness to heal the Israelites, Wikipedia +2 which Jesus later referenced in John 3:14-15 as prefiguring his own crucifixion. Wikipedia +7

I found it in a more recent and now out of print EPUB edition of the book. :)

ian cults with a restoration of Paradise, and release thereby from the bondages of time.

In the words of the Gnostic "Gospel According to Thomas": "Mary said to Jesus: 'Whom are thy disciples like?' He said: 'They are like little children who have installed themselves in a field that is not theirs. When the owners of the field come, they will say: "Release to us our field." They take off their clothes before them to release it to them and to give back their field to them.'"[Note 128] And again: "His disciples said: 'When wilt Thou be revealed to us and when shall we see Thee?' Jesus said: 'When you take off your clothing without being ashamed, and take your clothes and put them under your feet as the little children and tread on them, then shall you behold the Son of the Living One and you shall not fear.'"[Note 129]

Saint Epiphanius (c. 315–402) — who for thirty-five years was the bishop of Constantia, on Cyprus, where Aphrodite and her serpent spouse had been for millenniums the chief divinities, and whose lifetime spanned that critical century from the reign of Constantine (324–337) to Theodosius I, "the Great" (379–395), when the Roman Empire was being converted from pagan to Christian worship[Note 130] — described in a denunciatory tract the eucharistic service of one of the Christian Ophitic (ὄφις, "serpent") sects of his time:

> They have a snake, which they keep in a certain chest — the cista mystica — and which at the hour of their mysteries they bring forth from its cave. They heap loaves upon the table and summon the serpent. Since the cave is open it comes out. It is a cunning beast, and knowing their foolish ways, it crawls up on the table and rolls in the loaves; this, they say, is the perfect sacrifice. Wherefore, as I have been told, they not only break the bread in which the snake has rolled and administer it to those present, but each one kisses the snake on the mouth, for the snake has been tamed by a spell, or has been made gentle for their fraud by some other diabolical method. And they fall down before it and call this the Eucharist, consummated by the beast rolling in the loaves. And through it, as they say, they send forth a hymn to the Father on high, thus concluding their mysteries.[Note 131]

Professor Leisegang, from whose discussions of both the alabaster bowl of Figure 18 and Figure 19 and the golden of Figure 3 and Figure 4 we have already quoted, states in comment on this Ophitic sacrament described by Epiphanius, that for the rites of many pagan mysteries too, and those particularly of Dionysian type, a snake was kept in a chest. Then he adds: "We also know that the living snake was sometimes replaced by a golden one, which served in the performance of the initiate's mystical marriage rite with the godhead (Compare Occidental Mythology.). And it further seems possible," he concludes, "that an artificial snake could replace the real in the liturgy of the Ophites.... Might not the alabaster bowl," he then asks, "have served for the offering of consecrated wafers in a eucharistic ritual like that described by Epiphanius?"[Note 132]

The question opens a large prospect. For if it is possible to argue in this way from the Christian sect to a pagan and from a pagan to the Christian, it must also be asked how far the Gnostic versions of the agapē moved toward the Dionysian orgy, and how — of all beasts! — the serpent, which in normal Christian thought is the figure of Satan himself, could have been assigned the focal role in a Christian version of the mystic marriage.

Figure 32. The Serpent Lifted Up; golden Thaler, Germany, 16th century A.D.

Figure 32 is from a German sixteenth-century golden thaler struck by a celebrated goldsmith of the town of Annaberg in Saxony, Hieronymus Magdeburger by name. It is of approximately the date of Gafurius's "Music of the Spheres" (Figure 20), and can likewise have been influenced by Renaissance Neoplatonic thought. At first glance one might suppose it to refer to the upward turning of Gafurius's down-going Orphic serpent; and a consideration of the crucified Orpheus-Bacchus (Figure 11) might seem to support this interpretation, since Bacchus and the winged upward-turned serpent of the alabaster mystery bowl are the same.

However, there is also a perfectly orthodox way to interpret its symbolism, based on a sentence of the fourth Gospel: "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up."[Note 133] The reference is to that episode in the Book of Numbers where, the Hebrews in the desert having complained against both God and Moses (since there was no food or water), "Yahweh," as we read, "sent fiery serpents among the people and they bit the people, so that many people of Israel died. And the people came to Moses, and said, 'We have sinned, for we have spoken against Yahweh and against you; pray to Yahweh, that he may take away the serpents from us.' So Moses prayed for the people. And Yahweh said to Moses, 'Make a fiery serpent, and set it on a pole; and every one who is bitten, when he sees it, shall live.' So Moses made a bronze serpent, and set it on a pole; and if a serpent bit any man, he would look at the bronze serpent and live."[Note 134]

The incompatibility of this command with that supposed to have been previously delivered on Sinai, to make no "graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth" (Exodus 20:4), we may leave to the science of theology to resolve. Viewed historically merely, the tale was derived from the so-called Elohim (E) text of c. 750 B.C.,[Note 135] and was apparently the origin legend designed to account for the serpent-god of bronze that was in those days worshiped in the Temple of Jerusalem, together with certain images of his Canaanite goddess-spouse, Asherah. King Hezekiah, c. 725 B.C., as we are told in the Book of Kings, "cut down the Asherah: and he broke in pieces the bronze serpent that Moses had made, for until those days the people of Israel had burned incense to it; it was called Nehushtan."[Note 136] The approved Christian allegory is simply that, as the serpent of bronze lifted up by Moses on a staff counteracted the poison of a plague of serpents, so the lifting up of Jesus on the cross countervailed the poison of the serpent of the Garden. Both events are accepted as historical, and the earlier is read as a prefigurement of the later. We are not to think of Christ crucified as in any way another form of the serpent. The two sides of Hieronymus's golden thaler, in other words, are not to be reckoned as of equal value; nor is the higher value on the serpent's side. Or, at least, that is what a proper Christian would like to think the goldsmith intended us to understand.

Could it be, however, that he actually intended the reverse, namely, that Christ is a reference to the serpent, or even that the two are alternative manifestations of a power transcending both?

Throughout the material in the Primitive, Oriental, and Occidental volumes of this work, myths and rites of the serpent frequently appear, and in a remarkably consistent symbolic sense. Wherever nature is revered as self-moving, and so inherently divine, the serpent is revered as symbolic of its divine life. And accordingly, in the Book of Genesis, where the serpent is cursed, all nature is devaluated and its power of life regarded as nothing in itself: nature is here self-moving indeed, self-willed, but only by virtue of the life given it by a superior being, its creator.

In Christian mythology, supplementing the Old Testament, the serpent is normally identified with Satan, and the words addressed by Yahweh to the serpent in the Garden ("I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your seed and her seed; he shall bruise your head, and you shall bruise his heel")[Note 137] are taken to refer to the crucified son of Mary, by whose wounds Satan's force was to be broken. As pointed out in Occidental Mythology,[Note 138] the resemblance of the Christian legend of the killed and resurrected redeemer to the old myths of the killed and resurrected gods, Tammuz, Adonis, Dionysus, and Osiris, presented a certain advantage to the preachers of the new gospel, but on the other hand, also a danger. For whereas on one hand the resemblances made it possible for them to claim that in the historical reality of Christ's crucifixion the merely mythic promises of the earlier religions had been surpassed (As, for instance, in the Second Epistle of Peter (c. 120 A.D.): "We did not follow cleverly devised myths when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eye-witnesses of his majesty" (II Peter 1:16).), on the other hand the obvious resemblances also made it possible for converted pagans to regard the new revelation as simply one more transformation of Hellenistic mystery lore; and in fact, many sects of the first five or six centuries can best be understood in just that way.

Saint Hippolytus (d. c. 230), writing about a century and a half before the date of Epiphanius, opens a vista into the hidden sense, or "higher wisdom" (γνῶσις), of serpent veneration through his account of the cosmology of an Ophitic Christian sect of his day called the Perates:

> Their cosmos consists of Father, Son, and Matter, each of which three principles contains infinitely many forces. Midway between the Father and Matter, the Son, the Logos, has his place, the Serpent that moves eternally toward the unmoved Father and moved Matter; now it turns to the Father and gathers up forces in its countenance; and now, after receiving the forces, it turns toward Matter, and upon Matter, which is without attribute and form, the Son imprints the ideas that had previously been imprinted upon the Son by the Father.
>
> Moreover, no one can be saved and rise up again without the Son, who is the serpent. For it was he who brought the paternal models down from aloft, and it is he who carries back up again those who have been awakened from sleep and have reassumed the features of the Father.[Note 139]

For those interested:

files.catbox.moe/zo4f6i.epub

• • •