On War: I'm a creature of comfort, in many respects. I try to always do the most comfortable things. It may sound negative but couple it with this:

Since I was little, when I feel I wronged a person [even someone I didn't know], it would keep me up at night for weeks on end. /🧵

So I avoid doing this, and I apologise as quickly as I can when I inevitably make a mistake. I try to right these wrongs.

Some things are difficult to correct, but I still try to this day. Because I haven't grown accustomed to the feeling of accepting my own transgressions.

Unfortunately, many people have. Some people will completely destroy a person without feeling a thing. Or an animal. Or a tree.

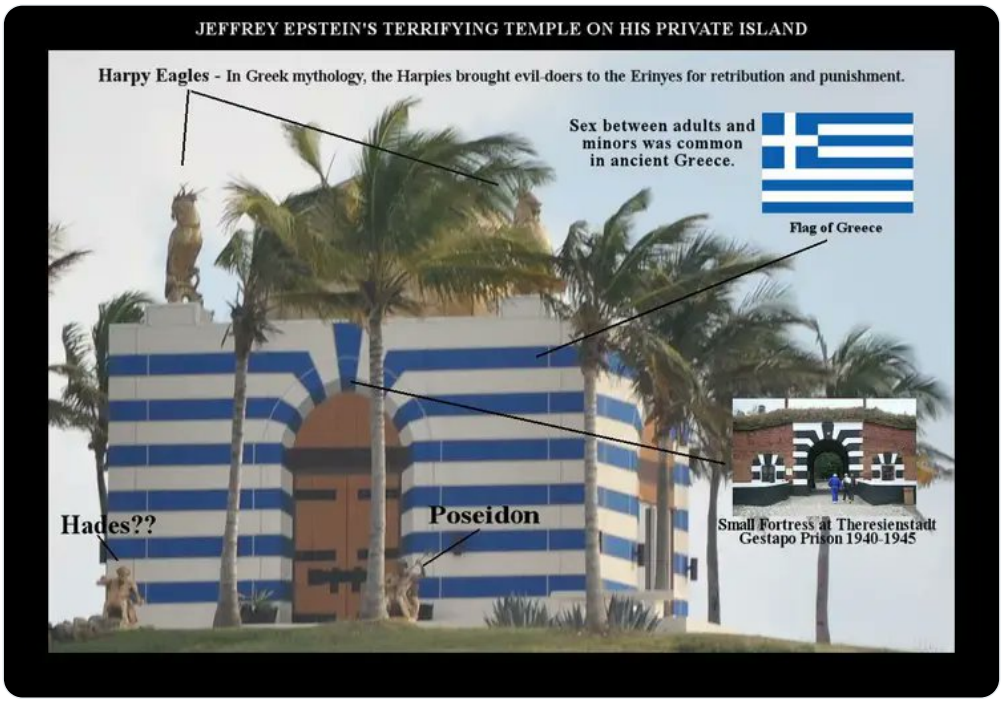
In the case of the Israelis, they completely destroyed an entire city while trying to gain sympathy for themselves and mocking their victims.

They are not creatures of comfort.
They grew accustomed to living with their transgressions. In fact, their entire demonic/talmudic religion is about killing their care, and growing accustomed to treating other people like they were rocks, not living beings.

Their mas*nic slaves are trained in a similar manner in the so-called "cremation of care" rituals, where they are made to believe they had just murdered someone.
Or, they're made to grow accustomed to it by r*ping a small child. And many more horrible acts.
Like cutting off a...

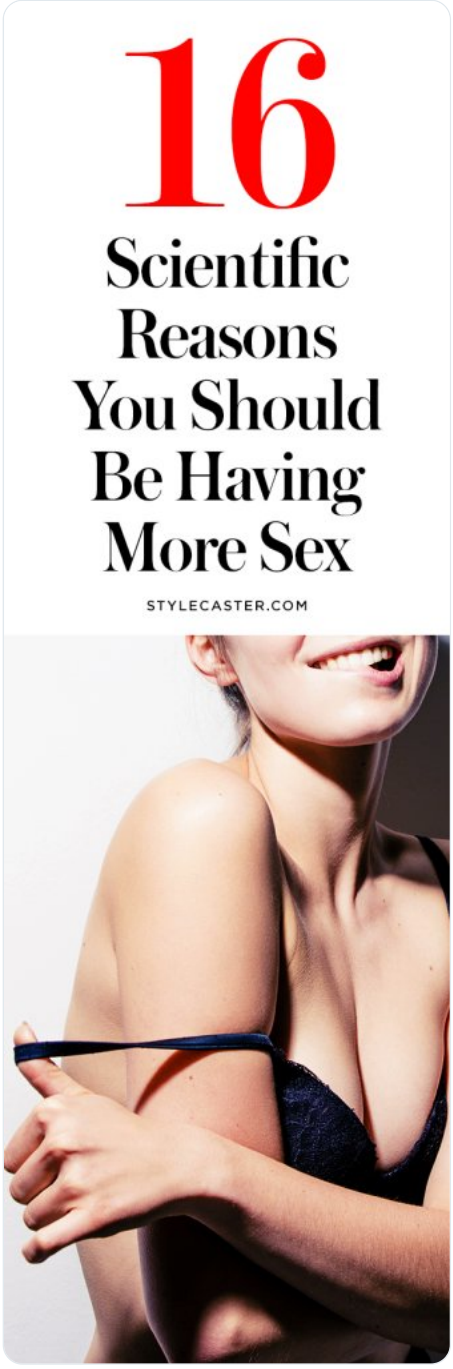
Anyway, these are satanic rituals in every sense. It makes them grow accustomed to evil, allows it to grow within them. Allows them to continue doing evil and so on.

Sadly, it's not limited to them. You see this in armies too. Elite troops are all "blooded", made to kill.



For most people, this act of killing leaves such a harsh mark on their soul, that they are never able to find redemption and never forgive themselves (see the testimony of many soldiers from WWI).
For these people, they only ever remember their first and feared themselves for it.

Importantly, this is why the media promotes sex/hook up culture to people. This is why they created and spread wood stock.
Women & men are shamed and programmed into this cycle. Made comfortable to fornicate, often with people they never meet again. Sometimes against their will.



And in the end they likely only remember their first, and in the most negative sense. Then they look for redemption their entire lives, by attempting to find a replacement for the "hole in their soul"... Which is a misconceptualisation.
They need to think of it a different way.

The soul is like a pure pool of water. Every thing you do is recorded into it. The good and the bad. These very evil acts are like toxic sludge poured into the pool. They leave their mark and dilute anything that comes in contact with them, into toxic sludge.

The best way to avoid this is to not commit these nearly irredeemable acts. It's the most comfortable choice.
Unfortunately we aren't so lucky this time,satan wants to force us to sin.
This is why God leaves the door open to redemption and can still save our soul with his spirit.

That's why the spiritual connection is so important in war. It is an act that will undoubtedly involve evil, unfairness, and ultimately, sacrifice.
Even within these terms, we have to find ways to do things in the most fair and just ways.

We must fight wars, in a manner that we can face God as we beg for forgiveness and clean the black marks on our souls because of it.

It would be so nice if we could live all of our lives in comfort and never allow Satan to hurt us with his sins. Some may still take this path!

And I don't see a problem with that, God bless them.
But I don't think I can. I don't think I can allow this evil to completely destroy God's creation.
It just feels wrong to me on a different level, on a level that may just make me feel like becoming uncomfortable in the future.

But not today, and probably not this year and so on. I don't think I'm alone in this thinking/issue.

Even as we watch Gaza in horror, as we watch feminism/LGBT/usury ravage our nations, we look for the most fair and comfortable way to fight this evil and those who spawn it...

...But in the mean time, we must seek to build spiritual strength, to overcome the discomfort necessary to fight the inevitable war that will be imposed on us.
The evil demons do not deserve to inherit the world. It will be up to us to prove it through our spiritual resolve.
