Korobochka (コロボ) @cirnosad

Mar 21, 2025 · 2 tweets · cirnosad/status/1902907491010351339

The main implication of the underground pyramid structure discovery is that no civilisation today could build this: and no civilisation in soy history could have built it either. These structures are undateable just like the pyramids.

This means they got history wrong. Likely maliciously!

Let's look back at one of history's survivors: Plato. He reported a disaster that had happened more than 9000 years prior to his time. He also reported that Egyptians had recorded this as a cyclical disaster that occurs at a set period. He also spoke of Atlantis, a far more advanced civilisation that existed in the previous cycle but was destroyed.

This discovery destroys the progressive perspective of history where a putative "cave man" decided to construct multiple disconnected civilizations out of the blue... thousands of years ago. If we were more advanced the further you go on into time it means several things, most importantly, that we are in fact decaying and not progressing. We would necessarily have to reject everything we know about the world. To the observant, however, none of this is new...

This is because the pyramids themselves could not be constructed with today's technology when you account for their earthquake proofing — and perhaps this strange underground structure is a kind of shock absorber for an event so destructive that most of the rest of the surface of the globe would not survive.

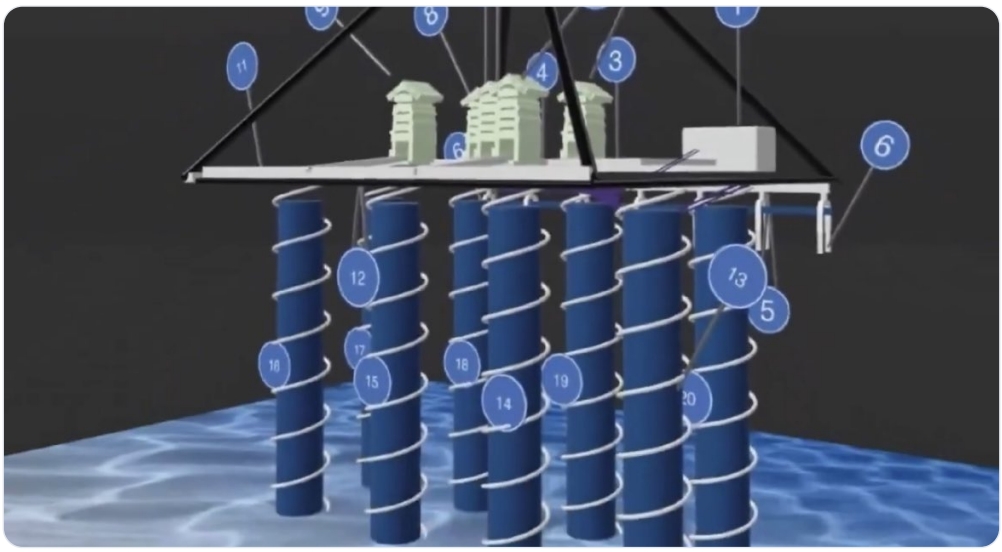
What is the purpose of the pyramid? Well, if we accept that this unknown event (what I call event X) was accounted for by the builders, we have to reject the idea that the pyramid was some kind of "religious" construction. What it has to have been is a message that is meant to last through time — they would know they wouldn't be around to use it otherwise. Logically, the pyramid itself and the structure around it has a purpose, and it's definitely related to this periodic destructive event, event X. I will one day try to convince you that these structures themselves are a kind of dooms day clock that indicates when this event will occur — and the key is the equinox cycle.

Nevertheless, whoever built it would have been even more generous — they left behind what appears to be a kind of time capsule.
There's no telling if someone has extracted it yet and is either keeping the knowledge for themselves or has destroyed it...

Perhaps in a previous cycle? I cannot tell.

There's also no telling with what was or is inside these time capsules but there's no doubt that we will get to the truth of all of this, because if my calculations are right, some of the people reading this tweet will be living through event X.

We will revisit this subject once all the prerequisites are properly explored.



Hall of Records

Article Talk

For other uses, see Hall of Records (disambiguation).

The Hall of Records is a purported ancient library that is claimed to exist underground near the Great Sphinx of Giza in Egypt. The concept originated with claims made by Edgar Cayce, an American who claimed to be clairvoyant and was a forerunner of the New Age movement. He said in the 1930s that refugees from Atlantis built the Hall of Records at Giza to preserve their knowledge. Cayce's assertions had many precursors, particularly the pseudohistorical theories about Atlantis that Ignatius Donnelly promulgated in the late 19th century, as well as claims about hidden passages at Giza that date back to medieval times.

Twitter won't let me edit this to remove this grammatical error.

There’s also no telling with what was or is inside these time capsules but there’s no doubt that we will get to the truth of all of this, because if my calculations are right, some of the people reading this tweet will be living through event X.

...