I want to make one important note about Syria before I go off writing. /📄

The Russian blogger sphere is going to prove to be extremely unreliable in terms of Syria coverage. They have a vested interest in minimizing the displayed abilities of the SAA and maximizing the reported reliance on the available Russian support.

This is of course absolute garbage, the SAA held on to its territory through the most violent terrorist attacks and unopposed Israeli air strikes. It survived and still survives and fights on, 13 years into the most sponsored proxy and direct war in history, with the US occupying all its natural resources.

Ultimately it's about political pressure and erasure of a people. They want to use their presence to pressure Assad into some kind of Zionist resolution, while also robbing the honor of Syrians and their achievements in self-defense and in balancing the roles of their allies. It's all about erasing Syria, the Zionists on land do it directly, the Zionists on the internet do it through their unfair and outright disgusting reporting.

Right now the only coverage they have is of the SAA "running away", but in reality every single retreat has been orderly and minimized workable equipment loss. This shows coherence, good organization and initiative. This is all because of forward planning, the SAA saw this invasion coming. The terrorists have lost thousands of people, while the SAA has only lost hundreds so far.

This is also why they undermine reports of paradrops and mock the notion -- paradrops are extremely difficult to pull off for multiple reasons, the biggest being logistical. In Hama, the paradrop was used to disorganize terrorists who intended to invade a fortified pocket adjacent to the city, and also to retake the airport for some time, for unknown reasons. Perhaps some important equipment remained there. It was like a mini-Gostomel due to the amount of MANPADs available to HTS. Many terrorists escaped the city that night and were gunned down along the road. It was executed successfully thanks to Russian specialists and the amazing VKS crew at Hamimeh.

The state of Hama now is unknown, as the terrorists were told not to film anything, and went radio silent for the next 5 hours. During the morning, another spread-head attack into the city was reported.

So respect the SAA as you would respect the Russian army. As you should respect the regular Ukrainian armed forces, despite their alignment. As you would respect Hezbollah. These soldiers are putting their lives on the line while we bash keys on a keyboard in the comfort of our own homes. Their commanders have their lives as their responsibility. If they call for a retreat, there is a good reason for it and it's not your imagined lack of morale, this will become obvious in due time.

We also don't know the full spectrum of political and military calculations the Syrians have to contend with. The prospect of Israel invading. The prospect of direct Turkish participation. The prospect of the US turning its forces into a spearhead to cut thin logistics. The actual force disposition (not our speculated one) and the strategic reserves that remain after so much Israeli bombardment is unknown.

Information is the real currency of war, and so many "oracles" on here are talking about Syria's defeat when the fire fights have not even begun!!!!

Today everyone is focused on the hordes of central Asian terrorists flowing out of the Idleb sewer and the "reconciled" terrorists taking their arms back up and vandalizing public buildings. Perhaps soon, they will realise that these enemies, while extremely damaging, are not truly what the Syrians were concerned about. This would explain their current hedgehog strategy.

Finally and on that note, another important note: The SAA has strategic weapons no one except Israel speaks of. These will play a factor in resolving this conflict, or perhaps ending the world due to domino consequences of their usage, once the terrorist hordes are defeated at the gates of Damascus and Homs. Everyone thinks Syria will disappear uneventfully because they saw Libya and Iraq go down without a fight.

Unlike these two, Syria never gave up its strategic weapons. With what is on the table, and hordes of head cutting jihadists descending upon Damascus and then the coast, there's no chance in hell that Syria is going down alone.
