Korobochka (コロボ) @cirnosad

Nov 16, 2024 • 1 tweets • cirnosad/status/1857594185311989956

Let's say this post is real. Here's where things went wrong. /

The man has expectations of women that no woman can meet. Women can become irrational. Women can be overwhelmed by their feelings. They can even get violent, self-destructive and/or abusive. The female brain is different to the male brain in many different ways, along with the body differences that are caused by not only hormones but phenotypes.

This man allowed himself to be affected by the actions of his woman. The regime enforces this as you're not allowed to restrain or do anything that was considered normal to bring an irrational woman back into line -- that wasn't called for in this incident, but the mentality eventually changes all male behaviour. You're forced to treat your "wife" as just another man.

And his best buddy (female at least in body) let him down and now he's upset. He even abandoned his hobbies (as cringe as some of them are) and seems to be extremely depressed over just the words of this woman. Allowing a woman to have this much power over you is extremely emasculating. If that upsets you for some reason, consider if the woman is a man -- imagine being this upset over your friend not liking your hobbies. Kind of an overreaction right?

So let us go back to something notable, why does this guy have hobbies at all? And why does he try to involve his wife in them? It's because society at large has denied this man general participation in a self-actualising way. Most things are banned, space is constrained, most other men have withdrawn too. He seems to have left himself without male friends either (or they would have just come to cheer him up and he could ignore his nagging wife).

So a lot went wrong here, but it's not primarily this crazy woman's fault. The truth is, all women are crazy to a degree. You get over it after your first close interaction or relationship once you realise this fact. This guy probably never had anyone else but this woman so he's taken it as a mortal wound. It's like his own mother scolded him. This is not acceptable. He needs to get over it and get back into his stupid hobby room and start soyfacing with his LEGOs as soon as possible. Divorcing over a comment like this isn't acceptable.

This is why women find the majority of men so repulsive today. They act like sissies. Imagine this guy inside of a trench in the coming war. He'd piss his diapers.

When you turn the women into men, you end up turning the men into women (as the case with this guy). It's a sure way to die. It's time for us to destroy the system that does this, or the end is going to be poor for all of us. How about that for a hobby?

/End

r/relationship_advice • 18 hr. ago
ThrowRApineapplesp

I(27F) screamed at my husband (28M) over his hobbies, and now he's changed and i don't know how to fix this.

Hey everyone, I need some advice about a situation with my husband. I'm 27F, he's 28M, and we've been married for 4 years. He has a room where he keeps all his hobbies—sim racing, aviation setups, soccer analysis tools, LEGO sets, music production equipment... basically, it's his sanctuary. He's super analytical and loves writing down and dissecting things, from sports to politics. He's slightly on the spectrum and very introverted, so he doesn't have close friends. I'm really the only person he shares everything with.

He's always inviting me into his space to be part of his interests. I love him and appreciate that he wants to include me, but sometimes I just need some time for myself. Recently, I snapped. I yelled at him, saying some hurtful things that I didn't mean, like how his interests bore me, that he needs to get a social life, and even questioned why I married him. I regret every word, but my anger got the best of me, and I couldn't control it in that moment.

Since then, he's completely changed. He stopped spending time in his room, moved to sleeping on the couch, and barely talks to me. He even ignored our usual tradition of watching our home nation's soccer team play, something he'd never skip before. Instead, he was working on his laptop, breaking our "no work at home" rule. When I asked him about it, he said he didn't care about the game and mentioned that maybe he should be more like his father, who's a workaholic and whom my husband idolizes. He even added, "I don't blame him for divorcing at that age now."

I've apologized multiple times, but he just says, "It's okay, maybe you're right," and shuts down any attempts I make to talk about his interests. I'm terrified he's considering divorce. I know I messed up, but I don't know how to rebuild trust and help him feel valued and loved again. I don't want to lose him, but I'm unsure how to approach this and make amends. Any advice?

TL;DR: I criticized my husband's hobbies, and now he's pulling away. I've apologized, but I'm worried he might be considering divorce—how do I make things right?

4.3K 3.8K Share

• • •