White Christian values explained #1
Why you should never speak ill of the dead. /🧵

Have you ever punched your fist in the air when you're really energetic or angry? Notice how it hurt your muscles almost the same way as making contact with something? Sometimes more, even though it's an empty punch? Every action has a reaction, and of course, your muscles, bones and joints will ultimately have to absorb the energy you used to throw your fist outwards.

When something comes out of you, especially when you attack someone, unless you are fundamentally broken, it's the same deal. If you attack someone and they don't fight back, a normal empathic person would back away or even try to make it up to the person attacked. This is part of why turning your other cheek, to a brother, is the most powerful answer to someone who has wronged you.

[Note: When I speak of "people" here I mean specifically white people. I don't believe neurology, physiology and spiritual essence is universal. In this work I hope to make us more relatable to those who do not understand why we do and say certain things.]

Those who keep attacking after the other side backs away or doesn't respond, are fundamentally broken. Their empathic unit is gone. Without empathy you will not be able to relate to people around you, or even understand yourself. It's an isolated hell that I don't want to even imagine. You can be surrounded by the entire world, but you will always feel alone, even on your interior.

This is why people flee a guilty conscience, often why even murderers turn themselves in or leave clues hoping to get caught. They want that part back after realizing what they have lost. Often, they will even yearn for punishment, feeling that in making a penance perhaps their soul will be redeemed.

Some even take their own lives over this, it is that strong of a force, much like an open punch, when you commit a crime that cannot be reversed, the force of your bloodied hand will ultimately come towards yourself -- inwards.

This is why you'll often see us get enraged when someone harms a small or helpless animal. This is a transference of empathy and a detection of a dangerous person. You see, these animals cannot respond back to whatever we do to them. It's much like an empty punch. None of us could forgive ourselves if we harmed them.

So when we see someone actively harming such animals, that have largely entrusted their safety unto us, we do get enraged for them. We become that inwards force, socially.

It's not "weird", it's actually perfectly predictable given how we think at a fundamental level: a person without empathy is a danger to the rest of us. They must be removed from society for our safety. They'd have no qualms about running us over or murdering us later.

In our experience, quite often, those who harm animals end up turning into sociopaths, serial murderer and worse. I've been to enough third world locations to see the lack of empathy and respect shown towards animals and for me, it is the main litmus test for the true value of a people.

Yet it isn't the only one...

There are other "empty punches" too, a people (such as the Judeosatanic people), that can completely destroy a city like Gaza, bomb its hospitals, brag about erasing its people, history and any traces of its existence, are a danger to the entire planet and must be removed forever.

A people that can do this, will eventually destroy the entire planet because this goes beyond harming one small animal. This is harming everything possible.

This is why you're seeing white and Christian support for Israel decline to zero. This is why even Charlie Kirk had his stomach turn when he realised what Netanyahu was planning, all the way back in 2023.

This is why Charlie Kirk is no longer with us. His empathy overcame his fear, seeing what his words and forced support of Israel were reaping on the innocents of Gaza. I have no doubt that he knew where his words would end up taking him.

And that brings us to one of the worst possible "empty punches": Speaking ill of the dead.

An ancient Latin phrase originating from the seven sages of Greece survives today: De mortuis nil nisi bonum. Of the dead, speak no ill.

When a word is spoken it is also heard, by yourself. You will remember reciting something better than merely reading it. Likewise, when you speak ill of the dead, you write these words into yourself. And memory is not erasable.

When you speak ill of the dead, you punch into the empty air, as the dead are not able to speak back to you. Nor forgive you for whatever you say.

Their families may, their friends may, but you cannot read what's in their hearts so can you truly forgive yourself?

Likewise, celebrating death is no different. It's fine to celebrate victory -- and in the context of annihilating a people that fundamentally exclude your continued existence -- it's fine to celebrate the safety of relief after they're all gone. But we don't celebrate death. We don't speak ill of the dead.

We move on.
We pray for their soul.
We let God figure out what was in their hearts all along, because we know how complex we are and we assume they are the same.

It's what we want for ourselves, and what we want for our families, and so we grant it to even our enemies. For who isn't an enemy of someone?

This is the golden rule of Jesus Christ: do unto others as you what you'd have them do to you. (Matthew 7:12)

I saw these rules broken many times since 9/11.
These unassailable societal and I would even say biological rules were thrown away once the Judeosatanic dehumanization machine went into high gear.

The US would murder someone like Solemani and a whole bunch of so-called "right wingers" (likely seeded by Judeosatanic influencers) would celebrate death. Would speak ill of the dead. Then this rot took hold of society, and today... I see people celebrating the passing of the pope, the assassination of Charlie Kirk and worse.

This satanic decline in morality did not come out of a vacuum. You could also see it amongst commies, sometimes extreme parties (celebrating executions in Argentina) and the horrific "revolutions" across Europe ever since the printing press was invented.

Turn away from this hell, and do not speak of the dead. Do not harm the innocent or the helpless. Protect your capacity for empathy and remember that we are what we behold.

... And on that note, there's really only one time you shouldn't pray for someone, when they have demonstrated that there is not a shred of empathy in them. In that case, it would be an empty prayer for they were never really alive.

Don't be that person, protect your empathy, so that when it is your time (may it be a very distant time in the future), people will speak well of you and pray for your soul.
