Korobochka (コロボ) 🇦🇺✝️🇷🇺 @cirnosad

May 2, 2024 · 4 tweets · cirnosad/status/1786011419907137561

A Ukrainian arms dealer sold Iran nukes in the early 2000s.

Here's the funny thing about this admission (which is a lie):
If the Kh-55s they sold lacked nuclear warheads, WHERE did those warheads go? The Russians did not receive the complete system. / 🧵

Arms Control Association

Google™ Custom Search Search

Log in

Ukraine Admits Missile Transfers

ARMS CONTROL TODAY

Paul Kerr

Ukrainian officials have acknowledged that a total of 12 Kh-55 medium-range, air-launched cruise missiles capable of carrying nuclear warheads were transferred from Ukraine to Iran and China in the last five years. U.S. officials expressed particular concern about the technical information the countries could likely gain as a result of the transaction.

Although the Soviet Union deployed the approximately 3,000-kilometer-range missiles with nuclear warheads, Ukrainian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Dmitry Svistkov told reporters March 30 that the missiles in question were not exported with such warheads.

Ukraine inherited a substantial nuclear arsenal after the breakup of the Soviet Union but later joined the nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty as a non-nuclear-weapon state. Kiev completed the return of the Soviet-era nuclear weapons in 1996 and has destroyed all of its bombers capable of delivering the Kh-55.

Either Iran has nukes (it does and did for a very long time), or Ukraine has nukes. Actually both.

Iran doesn't really hide it.

Top Iran Official: Enemies Will Face 'Rainy Day' Weapons in Case of Attack

Defense Minister Ahmad Vahidi hails Iran's independent weapons industry, military, adding that the U.S. would have to take a 'new environment' under consideration.

Haaretz Feb 28, 2012 Follow

Save Zen Read

Iran is prepared with hidden "rainy day" military capabilities it is saving for when it is attacked, Iranian Defense Minister Ahmad Vahidi said on Tuesday, warning potential enemies of a "new environment" created by Iran's developing arms

Iran says it has ‘secret weapons’

Special capabilities being ‘saved for a rainy day,’ claims defense minister

By AARON KALMAN
29 February 2012, 12:46 am

Iranian Defense Minister, Gen. Ahmad Vahidi (left), pictured with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad during a 2010 army parade (photo credit: AP Photo/Vahid Salemi)

Iran has military options unknown to the West, Iran’s defense minister said on Tuesday, saying the US fears a frontal show-down with his country.

Speaking to the Iranian Fars news agency, Ahmad Vahidi said his country has secret capabilities, which are being saved for “a rainy day.”

And those 20 Kh-55s sold to Iran (and China) by Ukraine?

There's 180 more such tactical nukes unaccounted for. /End

200 Soviet nukes lost in Ukraine

13.09.2002 03:14

RUSSIA

A nuke scandal is gathering steam

Pyotr Simonenko, the leader of the Ukrainian Communist Party released a sensational statement on Wednesday. In his words, there were 2400 nuclear warheads in Ukraine, although the export of only 2200 of them was officially documented. Simonenko claimed that nobody knows where 200 Soviet-era nukes in Ukraine are.

The official reaction followed the next day, but it was a rather weak one. Deputy chief of the Ukrainian Army Headquarters, Nikolay Goncharenko, declared that Simonenko's statement regarding the disappearance of the nuclear weapons from the territory of Ukraine was absolutely groundless. The high-ranking military official stated that all weapons of the trilateral agreement concerning the execution of the contract for strategic offensive arms had been handed over to Russia. Ok, but how come the leader of Ukrainian communists counted 200 nukes? It seems that the nuke scandal will continue.

...